SPRING 2026 EDITION

Smaller Plates, Smarter Profit

There is a reality settling in across foodservice and retail right now: the old playbook is getting harder to make work. Costs have moved up—sharply in some cases—and proteins, especially beef, have led the way. That pressure is real – all of us in the food business feel it. Restaurants feel it. Smaller grocers feel it. Specialty markets feel it. And when center-of-the-plate proteins keep climbing, the answer cannot always be to simply charge more and hope the customer keeps up. So, the smarter move may be this: rethink the role of the plate.

There is a lot of room right now in flavorful appetizers, creative handhelds, right-sized protein plates, and indulgent desserts. Not as a step down—but as a step forward. Dishes that are intentional. Built with purpose. Priced in a way that still works for both the operator and the customer.

That is where menu engineering matters. A steak sandwich built with a smaller cut, sliced thin and layered with bold flavor. A shareable appetizer that uses less protein but still eats like a treat. A composed plate built around a 4-6 oz. portion instead of the oversized cuts we got used to when everything had to be bigger to look impressive.

Truthfully, a lot of American menus have been oversized for a long time. More protein, bigger portions, heavier plates. But bigger is not always better—for the operator or the customer. Four to six ounces, presented well and supported by the right starches, vegetables, sauces, and textures, can feel more thoughtful, more modern, and more profitable. And it can feel better to eat that way too.

At Superior Foods, we think this is where smart operators can separate themselves. Not by backing away from protein, but by using it more strategically. Cut-size matters. Format matters. Preparation matters. Plate-build matters. The operators who win in this environment will be the ones who learn how to stretch flavor, protect margin, and still give the customer an experience that feels complete.

That may mean fewer giant entrees and more dishes with balance ... more shareables - more handhelds - more smaller-format plates with bigger personality.

In an expensive market, that is not settling. That is adapting.

But if you're going to adapt what is on your plate ... shouldn't it still be Superior?

FOUR ROSES CAFE

In an industry often driven by expansion and constant change, Chef/Owner Tom Rose has taken a more grounded approach. At Four Roses Cafe, the focus isn't on growth for the sake of it—it's on consistency, community, and doing things the right way.

Tom's path into the industry started in Plainwell, where he worked his way up from dishwasher. A formative stretch at Arie's Café, a scratch-made restaurant, helped shape his foundation—learning French techniques adapted for Midwestern tastes. It was also where he met his wife, Jan. After years in restaurants, Tom transitioned into foodservice management roles with companies like Kellogg's and Eden Corp while raising a young family. The move offered something rare in the industry: time at home. But the pull of the kitchen remained. About 15 years ago, the opportunity to purchase the building came along, so Tom and Jan decided to go for it and start Four Roses Cafe.

Today, the restaurant reflects that same intentional mindset. Named after Tom, Jan, and their two daughters, Four Roses is built around family. The café operates five days a week, closing Sundays and Mondays to allow staff time to rest and recharge. In the kitchen, the philosophy is straightforward: "Simple, real food." The menu evolves daily, shaped by seasonality, availability, and creativity.

"If you do the same thing over and over, you seem to find shortcuts, and don't necessarily keep the quality as high as it should be."

Local sourcing plays a major role. Produce and meat come from nearby farms, allowing the kitchen to rotate offerings while minimizing waste. The result is a menu that stays flexible and grounded in its surroundings. That same emphasis on relationships extends to trusted local partners like Superior Foods Company. As a fellow family-owned business, the alignment is natural—built on reliability and a shared understanding of what it takes to keep a kitchen running day in and day out.

That adaptability extends to the team. Four Roses has built a remarkably stable kitchen, with some employees there since the beginning. A few years ago, the structure shifted to a more collaborative approach, with the team meeting weekly to plan menus and share ideas. Even after scaling back to limited takeout hours during the pandemic, Tom and Jan chose to keep their staff intact and keep their pay the same as a full workweek.

"They work really, really well together. It's amazing to me how they can read each other's thoughts almost. I didn't wanna lose that crew. If they scattered to the wind it'd take years to bring that back."

Four Roses has developed a strong local following while drawing guests from surrounding cities. For Tom, success isn't measured by expansion or scale, but by consistency—showing up each day with the same commitment to quality, his team, and the community that supports them. It's a steady, intentional approach that has allowed Four Roses Café to grow into exactly what it was meant to be: a place people can rely on, again and again.

Michigan Turkey Co-Op has a simple mission: to provide nutritious, great-tasting, high-quality turkey products by growing, processing, and delivering a consistent, reliable, value-added source for foodservice and retail customers. With a strong focus on quality control from farm to finished product, they ensure dependable performance and flavor across every cut and format.

In 1998, Michigan Turkey Co-Op was founded by 15 growers who were looking for a way to bring their birds to market locally. Today, those same growers remain actively involved, serving on the board and helping guide the company's direction. This hands-on ownership model allows for greater flexibility, quicker response to customer needs, and a continued commitment to responsible farming practices. Rooted in local pride, they bring transparency, care, and consistency to every step of the process.

TRADITION YOU CAN TASTE!

Founded in 1962 by Louie Alpers, Louie's Meats began as a small, custom processor serving local farmers and businesses. What started in a modest facility quickly grew into a trusted name across the state, expanding into restaurants, delis, and foodservice distributors with the same hands-on care and attention to quality. In 1980, Louie's introduced its signature corned beef under the O'Brien brand—an instant classic that remains a customer favorite to this day. Still family-owned and proudly rooted in tradition, Louie's Meats continues to deliver consistent quality, outstanding service, and premium products made with USDA-inspected choice beef. Every item is produced with full HACCP compliance, ensuring both safety and flavor in every bite.
